Civil litigation system

1 The court system

What is the structure of the civil court system?

The civil court system in Colombia is composed of:

- municipal civil courts, which try small claims (up to 23,580,000 Colombian pesos);
- civil circuit courts, which hear cases when the claims exceed 23,580,000 Colombian pesos. Civil circuit courts may also decide appeals from certain municipal civil court rulings;
- district courts – civil division, which act as appellate courts; and
- the Supreme Court – civil division which decides extraordinary appeals from district court – civil division’s judgments. The decisions of the Supreme Court will be considered binding on all civil judges.

2 Judges and juries

What is the role of the judge in civil proceedings and what is the role of the jury?

Civil proceedings are mainly adversarial. The proceedings begin with the lawsuit filed by the plaintiff and the court is bound by the facts and claims presented by the parties. During the trial, the judge must remain impartial at all times. However, during the evidentiary stage of the proceedings, the judge may order the taking of evidence on his or her own initiative.

In class actions, the court has additional inquisitorial powers that allow the court to bring new defendants into the proceedings if there is evidence that the additional defendant might be liable for the damages or injuries allegedly caused to the group. In any case, these newly involved defendants will have the right to a due process.

On the other hand, Colombia does not have juries in its civil court system. The courts decide both questions of fact and law.

3 Pleadings and timing

What are the basic pleadings filed with the court to institute, prosecute and defend the product liability action and what is the sequence and timing for filing them?

Proceedings begin with a written complaint. After this document is filed and notice is served, the defendant may submit his response within 20 days. In class actions, the defendants must file an answer within 10 days from the serving of the notice. Then, the parties hold a mandatory mediation hearing before the court; if mediation fails, the court orders the taking of evidence. The judge will appoint dates for the hearings of the witnesses, order expert reports, consider the documents submitted by the parties and ordain any other evidence he or she deems necessary. Once the evidentiary stage ends, the parties have eight days to file their closing arguments. Finally, the court issues its decision. Actions may take up to three years at the trial stage. An appeal usually takes more than 10 months. An extraordinary appeal before the Supreme Court may take 15 months.

Congress recently enacted a new General Code of Civil Procedure which will gradually come into force from 2014. Under the new General Code of Civil Procedure, proceedings will be conducted orally by the courts.

4 Pre-filing requirements

Are there any pre-filing requirements that must be satisfied before a formal lawsuit may be commenced by the product liability claimant?

There is mandatory mediation requirement. The parties shall appear before a neutral third-party mediator. This pre-filing requirement does not apply for class actions and when the plaintiff also requests temporary injunctive relief.

5 Summary dispositions

Are mechanisms available to the parties to seek resolution of a case before a full hearing on the merits?

The defendant may seek a resolution before a full hearing on the merits, in limited circumstances. Summary judgment is available when the defendant raises the following defences: statute of limitations, res judicata and settlement. Summary judgments are subject to appeals.

6 Trials

What is the basic trial structure?

Colombian Civil procedure is mainly written at the time; however under the General Code of Civil Procedure, enacted on 12 July 2012 and which will come gradually into force, trials will be mainly oral and structured by consecutive sessions.

The court decides both the facts and the law, since there are no jury trials in Colombia. The courts must remain impartial at all times and grant all rights to the parties. During the hearings, witnesses are first questioned by the judge and then by the parties. The parties may also be questioned by the court and the opposing party. Written affidavits by the parties or witnesses are not allowed. Judges usually prepare questionnaires for the parties and witnesses.

Hearings are public.

The role of the advocate, besides from presenting her client’s case, is to file any pertinent written submissions, request and participate in the taking of evidence and to appear before the court. Advocates are not officers of the court.

7 Group actions

Are there class, group or other collective action mechanisms available to product liability claimants? Can such actions be brought by representative bodies?

In 1998 Congress enacted through Law 472 two types of actions. The first one is the class action, which is available when there are at least 20 alleged victims. The plaintiff may bring suit on behalf of the group if he or she alleges that there are at least 20 victims harmed under uniform circumstances. Group actions may be brought in pursuit of compensation for the injuries or damages caused by a defective product.

The second type of action is the public interest action, which may be filed by any citizen when a public interest has been harmed or is in danger. These actions may be also brought by associations (such as consumer organisations) in order to protect consumers' rights. Even though individual damages are not recoverable under these actions, they may be relevant in the product liability context, given that the court may order specific measures to hinder damages and injuries which may be caused by the defect. These measures could include, inter alia, product recall, modifications, warnings and changes in the design.

Public officials may also bring these actions in order to protect consumers from allegedly defective products.

8 Timing

How long does it typically take a product liability action to get to the trial stage and what is the duration of a trial?

From the moment the plaintiff files a lawsuit, it can take from 18 to 20 months for the trial Court to reach a decision. An ordinary appeal takes around one more year. Depending on the monetary value at stake, the case may reach the Supreme Court where proceedings could take up to two years.

Evidentiary issues and damages

9 Pretrial discovery and disclosure

What is the nature and extent of pretrial preservation and disclosure of documents and other evidence? Are there any avenues for pre-trial discovery?

Colombia does not have a broad American-style pretrial discovery. Instead, a limited pretrial discovery and disclosure of the documents are permitted. A party may request, before filing a complaint, a court order for the production of documents. The requesting party shall reasonably identify the subject-matter documents and state that the documents are in the possession of the requested party and how the documents are relevant for the forthcoming case. A party may also request the subpoena of potential witnesses or of the opposing party before the complaint is filed.

10 Evidence

How is evidence presented in the courtroom and how is the evidence cross-examined by the opposing party?

The taking of evidence is regulated in the Civil Proceeding Code (CPC). Both plaintiffs and defendants are allowed to prove facts by admission, witness testimony, expert examination and opinion, judicial inspection, documentary evidence and circumstantial evidence. The constitutional clause regarding due process allows the opposing party to contest evidence at different stages of the process. Witnesses are questioned by the Court and are also subject to cross-examination. Written statements or affidavits by witnesses are not allowed. Expert testimony is also available.

The parties may file expert reports. These must be made available to the opposing party, which may in turn question the expert, file an additional expert report, or both. Additionally, experts may be appointed by the court on its own initiative or if requested by any party.

11 Expert evidence

May the court appoint experts? May the parties influence the appointment and may they present the evidence of experts they selected?

Courts may appoint experts either at the parties' behest or on their own initiative. Courts must appoint experts from an official roster.

It is also possible for parties to present experts' reports. In such a case, the expert must appear at the court for cross-examination at the request of the opposing party.

12 Compensatory damages

What types of compensatory damages are available to product liability claimants and what limitations apply?

Different categories of compensatory damages are recoverable in a product liability case. Economic losses include both out-of-pocket expenses and lost profits. The victim is compensated only to the extent of the harm suffered. Economic damages recoverable in a product liability case include lost profits for bodily injury, loss of support in case of death and damage to property. There are no reported cases where the damage to the product itself has been an issue in a product liability action.

Non-economic damages, which include moral damages (eg, compensation for pain and suffering, emotional distress, psychological injuries, loss of a loved one or grievances) and compensation for loss of enjoyment of life, physical impairment or altered social, family or everyday activities are also recoverable in product liability cases. The Supreme Court periodically lays out guidelines for the compensation of non-economic damages. Under the current guidelines, a plaintiff may recover up to approximately 55 million Colombian pesos for moral damages and up to approximately 85 million Colombian pesos as compensation for loss of enjoyment of life, physical impairment or altered social, family or everyday activities. These guidelines are not, however, static and the Supreme Court allows the trial courts a relatively wide discretion in awarding non-economic damages. Non-economic damages are not, however, punitive or exemplary.

13 Non-compensatory damages

Are punitive, exemplary, moral or other non-compensatory damages available to product liability claimants?

The Colombian legal system prohibits punitive or exemplary damages. Victims are compensated only to the extent of the harm suffered.

Litigation funding, fees and costs

14 Legal aid

Is public funding such as legal aid available? If so, may potential defendants make submissions or otherwise contest the grant of such aid?

The CPC allows legal aid for those who cannot afford the costs and expenses of the trial without affecting their own subsistence. If granted, the party will not have to pay the costs of the experts appointed by the court nor will have to bear the attorney's fees and costs generally allocated to the losing party. Defendants can request the judge to withdraw such aid at any stage of the process by proving that plaintiff's situation has changed or that there are no motives to maintain the legal aid.

Certain public officials may, if requested, file class actions on behalf of a group. Law 472 of 1998 provides for the creation and operation of a public-run fund which provides legal aid and funding in class actions and public interest actions.

15 Third-party litigation funding

Is third-party litigation funding permissible?

The Colombian legal system neither regulates nor discourages such funding.

16 Contingency fees

Are contingency or conditional fee arrangements permissible?

Contingency fees are allowed and usually make part of the attorney-client agreement in tort and contract cases.

17 'Loser pays' rule

Can the successful party recover its legal fees and expenses from the unsuccessful party?

Unsuccessful parties must pay expenses (such as expert fees when appointed by the judge, taxes, document-copying fees, among others) and legal fees (attorney's fees), which the judge determines according to the rates defined in a specific regulation. In cases involving the state, legal fees and expenses are only recoverable by the successful party if the judge finds that there was no basis to litigate.

Sources of law18 Product liability statutes

Is there a statute that governs product liability litigation?

In 2011, the Colombian Congress enacted through Law 1480 the Consumer Protection Statute. This statute establishes a strict liability rule, under which the manufacturer and retailer are jointly and severally liable for injuries caused by defective products. Under this cause of action, the plaintiff bears the burden of proving the defect of the product, the injury or damages caused by the defective product and the causation between them. Defendants are excused from liability if they prove that the injury was caused by force majeure or it arises out of the plaintiff's fault or negligence, if the injury arises exclusively out of the actions of a third party, if the product had not been yet introduced to the market, if the defect arises directly out of the compliance of a mandatory rule or if the scientific or technical state of knowledge was not sufficiently advanced to enable the defect to be detected.

19 Traditional theories of liability

What other theories of liability are available to product liability claimants?

Until 2011, product liability rules were construed and applied by the Courts based on general statutes governing torts and contract causes of action. The Supreme Court applied a strict liability rule for product liability. Today, in addition to the strict liability rule available under the Consumer Protection Statute, the plaintiff may seek recovery based on fault-based liability rules. The latter is not however a separate cause of action but an additional theory available to the plaintiff.

20 Consumer legislation

Is there a consumer protection statute that provides remedies, imposes duties or otherwise affects product liability litigants?

The Consumer Protection Statute imposes several duties on manufacturers, importers, distributors and retailers, which affect product liability litigants. Under this statute, consumers are afforded protection against breach of warranties, breach of the duty to be fully informed and against deceptive advertisement. The Consumer Protection Statute also imposes the duty on any company involved in the chain of distribution to promptly disclose to public agencies any known circumstance that a defective product has caused or may cause injury; additionally, these companies shall take corrective measures. Failure to observe these duties shall result in joint and several liability with the manufacturer. Supervisory and control authorities may also impose fines on those who disregard their legal duties and can even close their public establishments.

21 Criminal law

Can criminal sanctions be imposed for the sale or distribution of defective products?

Even though there is no rule in the Penal Code that establishes a criminal sanction for those involved in the sale or distribution of defective products, the Consumer Protection Statute establishes the possibility to impose fines on all those who participate in the chain of distribution of defective products. In any case, if the defective product damages someone's property or causes personal injuries or even death, the person responsible for these crimes may be prosecuted according to the Criminal Code.

22 Novel theories

Are any novel theories available or emerging for product liability claimants?

The Consumer Protection Statute embodied most of the theory on this matter that had been advanced by the Supreme Court during the last few decades. This theory had been built on comparative law studies and the principles established in the Civil and Commercial Codes. Therefore, there are no novel theories on the subject in Colombia.

23 Product defect

What breaches of duties or other theories can be used to establish product defect?

Product defect may be established if the product's design, manufacturing, construction, packaging or warnings do not provide the reasonable safety standard that any person is entitled to.

24 Defect standard and burden of proof

By what standards may a product be deemed defective and who bears the burden of proof? May that burden be shifted to the opposing party? What is the standard of proof?

A product is deemed defective if it threatens someone's life, health or belongings. The plaintiff bears the burden of proving the defects; however, the Consumer Protection Statute does not provide a particular standard of proof. Under general evidentiary rules, the plaintiff shall present evidence that in the light of the sound judgment and reasoned analysis of the court shows that the product is defective. If a sanitary or technical regulation is violated, the defect of the product shall be presumed. In other cases, courts may under special circumstances shift the burden of proof onto the opposing party, if the opposing party is deemed to be in a better position to submit proof of a given fact. However, once the plaintiff proves that the product is defective, the manufacturer or seller may only be discharged if he proves one of the defences brought by the Consumer Protection Statute (force majeure, claimant's fault, etc).

25 Possible respondents

Who may be found liable for injuries and damages caused by defective products?

Under the Consumer Protection Statute, the manufacturer and seller may be found liable for defective products. Additionally, any other person or company involved in the chain of distribution may be jointly and severally liable for injuries caused by defective products if they fail to disclose known circumstances to public agencies or for failure to take corrective measures once the product's defect has come to their knowledge.

Update and trends

Due to the recent publication of the Consumer Protection Statute, all topics related to product liability have become emerging trends in our jurisdiction since there is no certainty on how the case law will be developed based on the new statute. There are many doubts regarding the way judges will determine causation, the burden of proof and the defences to exclude the liability of all those who participated in the chain of distribution of defective products. Once we have a proper body of case law, it is probable that the number of claims will increase and new theories will be created.

Additionally, it is worth mentioning that the Colombian state may be liable for failure to supervise or control defective products. There is currently one reported class action where the state's liability is at issue.

26 Causation

What is the standard by which causation between defect and injury or damages must be established? Who bears the burden and may it be shifted to the opposing party?

Neither the Consumer Protection Statute nor the Supreme Court rulings define a certain standard by which causation between defect and injury or damages must be established. However, judges have maintained that the plaintiff has the burden of proving not only that the product is defective but also that the damages or injuries suffered were caused by the unsafe conditions of the product. Under special circumstances, courts may shift the burden of proof onto the opposing party, if he is deemed to be in a better position to submit proof of a given fact. However, there is no reported case where the Supreme Court has shifted the burden of proof in this manner.

27 Post-sale duties

What post-sale duties may be imposed on potentially responsible parties and how might liability be imposed upon their breach?

The Consumer Protection Statute obliges manufacturers and product suppliers to warn the competent authorities about any known adverse effect of their products. Additionally, they have to maintain records of warranties in case they have sold a defective product. Manufacturers and retailers may have the duty to recall a product and to supplement warnings imposed on them. The Superintendence of Industry and the commercial and civil courts have the express power to sanction those who do not follow the provisions of the Statute.

Limitations and defences28 Limitation periods

What are the applicable limitation periods?

The limitation period for product liability is 10 years and generally runs from the date on which the damage or injury occurred. However, under special circumstances, if there is evidence that the plaintiff was not aware of the injury at the time it was caused, courts will rule that the limitation period starts from the date on which the plaintiff should have discovered the injury.

There is a two-year limitation period for group actions. If the applicable statute of limitations for class actions runs out, plaintiffs may sue individually.

29 State-of-the-art and development risk defence

Is it a defence to a product liability action that the product defect was not discoverable within the limitations of science and technology at the time of distribution? If so, who bears the burden and what is the standard of proof?

The defendant may be excused from liability if as of the date that the product was introduced to the market, the defect was not discoverable within contemporary scientific and technological limitations. However, liability may later arise if any person involved in the chain of distribution fails to promptly disclose any known circumstance that the defect has caused or may cause injury or fails to take corrective measures after such knowledge was acquired.

30 Compliance with standards or requirements

Is it a defence that the product complied with mandatory (or voluntary) standards or requirements with respect to the alleged defect?

The defendant is excused from liability if the defect is a direct result of compliance with a mandatory rule or standard for the manufacturing, warning or packaging of the product, as long as the defect cannot otherwise have been avoided without breaching this mandatory rule or standard. Compliance with voluntary standards or requirements is not a valid defence.

31 Other defences

What other defences may be available to a product liability defendant?

Under the Consumer Protection Statute the defendant shall be excused from liability if:

- the injury is caused by force majeure;

32 Appeals

What appeals are available to the unsuccessful party in the trial court?

The unsuccessful party may appeal the trial court's decision. Depending on the monetary value at stake, the unsuccessful party may further appeal before the Supreme Court. These appeals are also available in class action litigation.

Jurisdiction analysis

33 Status of product liability law and development

Can you characterise the maturity of product liability law in terms of its legal development and utilisation to redress perceived wrongs?

Product liability is a developing field in Colombia. There have been several Supreme Court cases dealing with basic issues of product liability. However, product liability is still a novel area of the law and the volume of claims is as yet relatively low and there is not a fully developed body of case law. Additionally, the recently enacted Consumer Protection Statute has not yet been properly developed by case law. There is growing interest in the field and one can expect a significant increase in the caseload in the following years.

34 Product liability litigation milestones and trends

Have there been any recent noteworthy events or cases that have particularly shaped product liability law? Has there been any change in the frequency or nature of product liability cases launched in the past 12 months?

As mentioned above, the recently enacted Consumer Protection Statute will shape the new developments on product liability. At the time of writing, since the Consumer Protection Statute was only recently enacted, there has not been an increase in the number of claims filed for product liability.

35 Climate for litigation

Please describe the level of 'consumerism' in your country and consumers' knowledge of, and propensity to use, product liability litigation to redress perceived wrongs?

There is a growing trend of consumerism. The Consumer Protection Statute, which has been widely publicised and discussed, is the result of a growing public concern to remedy perceived wrongs. Additionally, any person has standing to file a public interest action for the protection of public interests, which include consumer's rights, public safety and health. Finally, the local media shows great interest in product defect allegations and, generally, in consumer protection claims.

36 Efforts to expand product liability

Please describe any developments regarding 'access to justice' that would make product liability more claimant-friendly.

Class action litigation is a major development in the field. Under Colombia's class action statute, counsel for the plaintiff is entitled to recover 10 per cent from the damages afforded to members of the class who did not personally intervene. Additionally, contingency fees are permissible and widely used in liability cases. Therefore, class action litigation poses a significant financial incentive to plaintiff's counsel and additionally promotes litigation even in low-value injury claims covering a wide group.
